A National Do-Not-Call List is unnecessary. I have requested that companies place me on their do-not-call list as required by Virginia law and it has worked fine. In addition, the Direct Marketing Association has provided a means to reduce print and electronic materials from their members. These measures have worked fine. There is nothing wrong with placing a little bit of burden on people to control what information they receive and from whom. They only need the tools to accomplish this task. The only thing that a national Do-Not-Call list will do is increase the amount of spam that we receive. In addition, telemarketers will become more innovative and reach us in ways that are far more costly and intrusive.
