Appendix 2B. Monthly Project Focus

The FHP staff developed a targeted plan for project focus and outreach goals during each month. This document was also distributed and discussed each week at FHP team meetings. Attention was given to ways in which to tie the FHP to holidays, observances, and special hospital events occurring in a given month.

– Event

In Spring 2006, all employees were invited via electronic communication and personally by project staff and volunteers to submit photographs of their families to the BWH FHP for the “Brigham and Women’s Hospital Family History Project Springtime Family Photo Gallery”. Employees could share photographs of their families to the BWH FHP, with “family” deliberately broadly defined. Photographs were submitted in one of two ways: electronically to the project email address, or delivered to “Photo Drop-Off” sites around the hospital and off-site locations. Every photo entry required a submission form with the employee’s contact information. Hard copies of photographs received were electronically scanned, and the actual photographs were returned to the employees. Photographs submitted to the Springtime Photo Gallery were affixed to large, white wooden boards and arranged in the hospital’s main lobby for employees and visitors to browse 24 hours per day over a two week period.

Appendix 4B. Take Our Children to Work Day – Event

RADM Kenneth Moritsugu, MD, MPH, then Deputy Surgeon General of the United States, visited BWH on “Take Our Children to Work Day” and delivered a talk to employees and their children about the importance of knowing and recording one’s family history. The children had the opportunity to ask Dr. Moritsugu questions and to participate in a group photograph with the Deputy Surgeon General.

4B3. WBUR Transcript

Interactive Center Launched on May 19, 2006

Launch of the Brigham and Women's Hospital Family History Project's Interactive Center, where BWH employees can be guided through "My Family Health Portrait" or enter their family health history information with FHP staff assistance.

....put your name in here...just like that....this is about your health, are you a pretty healthy person?

Narrator: It's family day here at the Brigham and Women's Hospital and Chantal Kelly, a genetic counselor is helping 11-year old Gabriela Juliano create an electronic family medical history.

Gabriela: [filling in the medical history form] No, no., I don't have diabetes.

Chantal: [Assisting with remaining family history] and you don't have...you said, no asthma, no allergies, nothing else?

Gabriela: No, not that we know of.

Chantal: Excellent

Narrator: Gabriela checks no for six common chronic, sometimes preventable, diseases-stroke, heart disease, diabetes and three types of cancer. Gabriela clicks opens a page with the same questions for each family member building a medical family tree.

Gabriela: My mom's name is Catherine....she's like-allergic to dogs.

Chantal: Does she have asthma? Okay, that's important to know.

4B3. WBUR Transcript

Narrator: Gabriela glances back at her father, Robert Juliano, a cardiologist at the Brigham for a few answers. She rolls her eyes when dad suggests that her brother Dante's obsession with hockey is a medical condition. Gabriela remembers, without help, that one grandmother has diabetes and that her grandfather has heart disease.

Chantal: And this is for your grandmother on your mom's side?

Narrator: But many of the Brigham employees working on their electronic medical histories say that they grew up with little or no information about the genes they inherited. Ann Haley, the manager of office services is also the daughter of a doctor.

Ann Haley: We have everything in our family; we've got addictions, we've got melanoma, diabetes. You know, big things that you would want your doctor to know about and it's funny because growing up in a medical family you would think that we would be aware of all of this and we weren't.

Narrator: Haley says that not knowing has taken a toll on her family

Ann Haley: Every single relative practically that I have has diabetes type 2 and why didn't we think that we were all going to get it and make sure that we could prevent it by losing weight-we all waited till it was too late and then we all got it.

Narrator: The U.S. surgeon general says a complete family medical history can be as important to good health as high tech testing and other procedures. Dr. Michael Murray heads the family history project at Brigham and Women's.

Dr. Murray: In 2006 there may only be 3 or 4 diseases that we can really take a family history and say these families need to be tested for these genes but I think that in 2010 that number will be much larger and in 2015 it will be larger still.

Narrator: The program designed by the Surgeon General only asks about six diseases but leaves space to add information about any other medical conditions in the family. Murray who is also the clinical chief of genetics at Brigham and Women's says it makes sense to look for patterns in health problems that might be adopted as well as inherited, mental illness, addictions, obesity or lung diseases.

Dr. Murray: the value of the tool goes beyond just the genetics. We know that diseases run in families not only because of shared genes but also because of shared environmental factors.

4B3. WBUR Transcript

Narrator: The project started last fall. Murray says that he doesn't yet know how many of the Brigham's 12,000 employees are participating.

Narrator: Some can't. Chris DeGraw Dana is the director of volunteer and community services.

DeGraw Dana: I was adopted in the sixties and they did not have any legislation in place where I as the birth child would be able to find my birth parents. It's a closed record adoption. I know how tall they are and what color their eyes and hair were but that's about it.

Narrator: DeGraw Dana has volunteered to help other Brigham employees who are frustrated because they are estranged from their family or have lost family members with key medical information. She says people have to accept that and focus on their own health. The biggest obstacle for some employees at the Brigham has been gathering accurate information. In one case there was a fight over a holiday dinner about how a relative died and Phillistine Ongondo says it took more than a dozen conversations with family members before she got what she thinks is a complete medical history.

Ongondo: What I did was I said is you want your children to be safe.....you use the children factor sometimes, you have to kind of coax them along there is always some resistance-you have to go after them one at a time until I got them to do it.

Narrator: Ongondo who works in the department of physician services discovered what her grandmother had described as stomach problems was really colon cancer, what another relative called, sugar, was diabetes, but that was overshadowed by asthma but that was also ignored until it led to an infection In Ongondo's family there is also hypertension and high cholesterol that no one wants to talk about.

Ongondo: I think it's fear. If you don't talk about it - maybe it will go away. And I think a lot of families do that but in the minority family they just don't want to burden their children a lot of times, with these problems. So.....these are all things that we are finding out now and it's interesting, a little scary but also I feel empowered now because now I can pass this to my children and my children will have a better chance...a better chance of surviving.

4B3. WBUR Transcript

Narrator: Ongondo says she is confident that her medical history will be secure. But some employees are hesitant to take part because they are worried about the privacy of the record. It is created on a secured website that can be accessed only by that participant who can then copy it to paper or a CD. Organizers say that participants must be cautious about sharing the information with anyone but family members and physicians.

Narrator: For WBUR, I'm Martha Biebinger.

*Appendix 5B. BWH 2006 “Street Beat” Event –
Photograph of T-shirt and Logo*

The BWH Staff Activities and Advisory Committee (SAAC) sponsors an annual outdoor BWH summer event entitled “Street Beat”, which highlights the diversity of the BWH workforce by showcasing ethnic cuisines and performers from various cultures throughout the world. Each year, Street Beat has a different theme and creates a promotional logo to advertise the event. The theme for the 2006 Street Beat event was “Strong Roots, Many Branches”, and the logo was a large tree: a natural representation of the family “tree” created when one uses “My Family Health Portrait”.

Appendix 6B. BWH FHP's "Ice Cream Social"

Event – Photograph of "Celebrity Scooper"

To further boost participation during the Fall survey period and to thank employees for their participation, the BWH FHP offered an incentive to employees who returned a completed survey. Project staff decided to host an "Ice Cream Social" event within the hospital cafeteria for all BWH employees. Employees were invited to make their own sundaes during one of two ice cream social sessions. Given the fact that the hospital is a 24 hour a day workplace, socials were scheduled at 3pm-5pm and 10pm-12am. Admission into either session required that the employees had a completed BWH FHP Fall survey (see Appendix 3C). Project staff and volunteers were available during both sessions to distribute blank surveys, collect completed surveys, and to scoop ice cream for participating employees. Several of BWH's Executive Management Group, including hospital Associate Chief Medical Officer Dr. Robert Goldszer, rolled up their sleeves along with our volunteer staff to help scoop ice cream for the approximately 1000 employees who participated across the two sessions.
