3. Average Monthly Clearing Dealers

The fifth column indicates the average monthly number of clearing dealers, out of the 17, that executed transactions on that reference entity on a monthly basis. A clearing dealer will be included for each month as long as they executed at least one transaction during each month. For purposes of this analysis, a month was considered to be from the 20th of each month through and including the 19th of the following month. This figure is shown rounded to one decimal place.

4. Average Daily Notional (USD equivalent)

The seventh column represents the average daily notional of transactions executed on each reference entity name. This notional represents the amount executed across the entire maturity spectrum for each of the reference entity.

All trading has been converted to its USD equivalent using FX rates from the end of June. The average daily notional amounts have been rounded up to the nearest 2.5 MM for average daily amounts less than 25 MM and rounded up to the nearest 25 MM for all amounts over 25MM.

5. Average number of trades per day

This represents the average number of transactions on each reference entity executed on a given day. This is the rounded number of transactions and not sides.

ICE CLEAR CREDIT LLC EXHIBIT H: PORTFOLIO APPROACH TO CDS MARGINING AND INDEX DECOMPOSITION METHODOLOGY

ICE Clear Credit Portfolio Approach to CDS Margining and Index Decomposition Methodology

1. Overview

To provide efficient margin benefits for portfolios containing offsetting positions in both Index CDS and single-name CDS, index products are first decomposed to produce single-name index-derived positions with notional sizes corresponding to their weight in the index. These new, "synthetic," single-name positions have a coupon which is the same one as the index from which the single-name positions have been derived. Another set algorithm identifies long-short (index/single-name) pairs with the same expirations. Preference is given to offsets that minimize curve risk. If the notional amounts in the single-name products correspond to opposite (offsetting) positions, the index-derived notional amount is reduced by the available opposite single-name positions without changing the direction of any single-name positions. If the opposite index-derived or outright single-name positions do not have the same maturities, the notionals of the outright positions are expressed as equivalent notional amounts of the corresponding index-derived positions in such a way that the Risky PV01 (the present value of 1 (one) basis point of risky annuity paid or received, until the earlier of a credit event, or the maturity of the CDS contract) remains constant after change of notional. Once the opposite positions have the same maturities, offsets are provided. If either the long or the short positions are in excess, the unconsumed notional amounts are expressed back at their original maturities.

In summary, the effect of the index decomposition methodology is to start with the actual portfolio and to end with a "reduced" position in index and single-name products. The reduced portfolio is then subjected to Spread Risk Requirements as explained in subsection 2. below.

The portfolio decomposition methodology provides benefits by recognizing hedges and diversification benefits within portfolios. Index replication benefits are considered with explicit modeling of basis risk and basis risk requirements are introduced. The risk management approach establishes stress loss analysis at selected quantile levels as the main risk methodology used for estimating risk margin requirements, Guaranty Fund size, and Guaranty Fund allocations.

2. Spread Risk Requirements

One of the main components of a risk management model is the univariate distribution that describes the random realizations of a price determining factor. The common models are usually first calibrated by estimating an appropriate distribution to a time series of past realizations of the driving factor, and subsequently this distribution is used for risk management purposes.

The main price determining factor of cleared CDS instruments is the default probability of the underlying name(s). Since default probability is not directly observed in the marketplace, a common practice is to model the market implied credit spreads.

To arrive at plausible credit spread scenarios, ICE Clear Credit models the realizations of credit spread log-returns. The log-return modeling approach readily accounts for the nonnegativity of credit spreads. It is assumed that credit spread log-returns are drawn from a heavytailed skewed distribution as empirical analysis indicates. The distribution used is assumed to be relatively static in the sense that it does not change over a short period of time. The only timevarying (dynamic) distribution parameter is the scale. These specific assumptions are introduced to provide more stable and more easy-to-reproduce numerical results. The assumptions can be readily relaxed if necessary.

3. Liquidity Charges

The portfolio bid/offer requirements, liquidity charges ("LCs"), are estimated prior to the index decomposition. For all long protection index positions, the LCs are estimated by considering the current default bid/offer width values for Level II Conditions as reviewed by the CDS Risk Committee. All short protection index positions are subject to LCs estimated with the respective bid/offer width values corresponding to Level III Conditions. ${ }^{1}$

The bid/offer requirements for long-short positions in the same index series and different tenors are subject to the single name bid/offer approach. The estimated LC for each series within the index risk factor is taken with the sign of the net notional amount for that series. The resulting numerical values for all series are added together, and the final index risk factor LC is the negative of the absolute value of the sum. The total portfolio LC is the sum of the individual index-specific LCs and the single name LCs.

Since the LCs for index and single name instruments are not subject to any portfolio benefits and they scale with the spread levels, the overall basis risk requirements are dynamic and increase during periods of spread widening. The model response is consistent with the observed market behavior of widening basis upon spread widening. The methodology provides dynamic bid/offer requirements, and thus dynamic basis risk requirements, to reflect the increased risk during periods of worsening economic conditions.

4. Concentration Charges for Large Positions

Large position requirements, referred to as concentration charges, apply to long and short protection positions that exceed a predefined risk factor specific notional threshold level. The concentration charge threshold reflects the market depth and liquidity for the considered risk factor. The threshold is established by ICE CDS Risk Management staff, in consultation with ICE CDS Risk Committee.

5. Jump-to-default Charges

The CDS risk management approach incorporates a jump-to-default requirement for each single name risk factor for sold protection positions. The portfolio jump-to-default requirement is bounded by the potential liabilities associated with three simultaneous credit events for some assumed single name-specific minimum recovery rate. An expected minimum recovery rate is established for every industry sector by ICE Clear Credit and reviewed quarterly by the ICE Clear Credit CDS Risk Committee.

6. Portfolio Basis Risk Requirements

As index-derived single name positions and outright single name positions are offset, additional basis risk requirements are introduced due to the fact that the indices are more actively traded and thus the preferred instruments to express changing views about the credit market as a

[^0]whole, or even about specific single name components of the indices. Consequently, the price of the index instruments might be moving faster than (ahead of) the single names, and thus creating a greater difference between the quoted spread and the fair (intrinsic) spread. In addition, the coupon standardization introduces new aspects to the basis risk concepts due to the uncertainty of single name coupon choice by the market place, and/or by the improved ability to replicate the streams of future payments. The liquidity of the index provides lower risk premium compared to less actively trade single name instruments.

7. Portfolio Interest Rate Sensitivity Requirement

To account for possible risk associated with changes of the interest rate default-free discount term structure used to price all CDS instruments, the model considers parallel shifts of the discount term structure used within the ISDA model. Up and down parallel shifts of the current discount "curve" are utilized to uncover potential portfolio losses. The worst portfolio loss resulting from the difference between the values of the portfolio estimated at the current discount term structure and at either of the simulated ones establishes the interest rate sensitivity requirement. The parallel shifts will be associated with the equivalent of 5 -day $99 \%$ expected shortfall for the rate changes for the tenor associated with the longest maturity cleared CDS instruments (i.e., currently 10-Year). The parallel interest rate shifts are viewed as the first order sensitivity drivers. The parallel shift parameters, in general, are asymmetric and produce nonnegative discount rates. Currently, the up-shift is estimated to be 45 basis points, and the downshift is estimated to be 35 basis points. The resulting discount curves are non-negative by construction.

The magnitudes of the considered scenarios, as designed to reflect the current interest rate sensitivity requirement levels and their variabilities, are subject to review and changes, if necessary, upon consultation with the Risk Committee.

[^0]:    ${ }^{1}$ Level I, II, and III Conditions represent observed bid/offer width reflecting different market conditions Level I representing the most actively traded state and Level III the most volatile trading state (wider bid/offer widths). The bid/offer width values used for the LC estimations are reviewed quarterly by the ICE Clear Credit Risk Committee.
